Communications & Visual Media Director, American Rivers

I believe that open spaces, wild landscapes, and free-flowing rivers deserve all the respect and reverence we can possibly afford them. With that in mind, I enthusiastically pursue my role with American Rivers and strive to raise the profile and prominence of the organization across the country. With a bachelor's degree in Environmental Science from Ball State University, and an extensive background in whitewater rafting, mountain biking, mountaineering, and mountain rescue, exploration of the outdoors is paramount to my life and career. Primarily a writer, photographer, and creator of short films, I am versed in broad conservation issues of the Colorado Basin and the west, particularly water supply issues and protection of the Colorado River itself. Driving communications and advocacy across the west is a thrilling and consuming adventure, and one met with optimism and gusto. I live in Durango, Colorado, commonly known as "Paradise."
